MT. MCKINLEY TOP GREAT DOME OF ICE

Professor Parker Tells of Efforts to Reach Summit of Mountain.

TRIP PERILOUS IN EXTREME

Narrative of Hardships and Narrow Escapes From Death.

New York, September 29.—Professor Herchel C. Parker, who has just returned from Alaska, where he headed the expedition that scaled Mount McKinley, the loftiest peak in North America, talked yesterday of his efforts to reach the summit of the mountain.

It was a narrative of hardships and thrilling experiences, and at times of narrow escapes from death. Professor Parker came within 300 feet of the highest hummock of snow that crowns Mount McKinley's dome. For days at a time the Parker expedition subsisted on crackers and tea.

"On January 15 last," Professor Parker said yesterday, "we landed at Seward, which is the furthest north into Alaska by rail or boat. There our party, which consisted of Belmont Brown, of Seattle, Arthur M. Allen, formerly of New York, Merle La Voy, of Seattle, and myself, began the journey in the direction of McKinley.

"From Seward we used dogs and sledges. We traveled 175 miles, following the Susitna River, and thence 150 miles along the banks of the Chukchi, and then traveling forty miles to the mountain range. Incidentally, I may remark that on this journey we discovered, among other interesting things, three great glaciers. The new country was mapped as we went along, and when March ended we had reached an altitude of about 6,000 feet. A few days later we were within twenty miles of Mount McKinley. Of this country we are now in possession of the only complete series of maps ever drawn.

"On April 25 we established our base camp. We cached a month's supply of fuel and food at an altitude of 10,000 feet. It was then bitter cold, and we had to spend eight days here waiting for the weather to moderate. We knew from former experiences that the ascent of Mount McKinley from the south was impossible, so we laid our plans for a climb from the northwest.

"McKinley, you should remember, is 29,000 feet high, and we were then only about half the distance to the summit.

"La Voy slid into a crevasse. 'May I come, and on that day we left our cache and began to climb. It was then 10 degrees below zero. Blizzards still prevailed, and it was getting colder all the time, the outcome being that we had to halt after a short journey, owing to the intense cold, and this time we were held up until June 5."

"The original plan was that it should have taken only fourteen days to get within hailing distance of the summit, but the weather conditions encountered were so unfavorable that the expedition was on the mountain for twenty-eight days, during most of which time the members were plodding with the aid of snowshoes through a fresh snowfall more than five feet in depth. Underneath the new snow were numerous crevasses, some of them wide enough for a big truck to fall through, and time and again the band of explorers had the narrowest sort of escapes from what would certainly have been death.

Professor Parker and Brown and La Voy were roped together, a precaution that saved La Voy's life on one occasion. La Voy struck a crevasse and fell through, but was pulled back to safety by the companions to whom he was roped. He went down to a depth of twenty feet, and his fall was stopped by a hummock of solid snow, otherwise he probably would have dragged Professor Parker and Brown down with him. When the fall was halted, Professor Parker was on his knees and being dragged slowly in the direction of the hole into which La Voy had plunged.

For the first time dogs and sledges were used by the expedition all the way up the mountain. The men were not roped to the dogs, for had the animals struck a crevasse the heavy sledges would have dragged every man down with it. Professor Parker described in brief the hardships encountered in the ascent from an altitude of 8,000 to 20,000 feet.

"At times," he said, "we were forced to cross shaky snow bridges, and it almost drove us crazy. A single misstep would have finished us. At the 12,000 mark we struck a ridge that in places was scarcely five inches wide, with a 50-degree slope, and it was so difficult that it took us a week to relay our supplies only 3,000 feet."

"Our last camp was made at the 17,000 mark—just 3,000 feet from the summit. The storms were so blinding that we had to stay there four days. Our progress for the last 1,000 feet was up a sheet of glaciers, and here the danger lay in the fact that just as fast as the steps were cut they were filled again with the drifting snow. All the way up we were forced to take the most terrible risks. Great mountains of overhanging ice threatened to come down upon us in an avalanche every moment."

Professor Parker was asked what the top of McKinley is like.

"It is a great dome of ice," was the reply, "and scattered along the range are a number of large hummocks, or hills, of ice. The point we reached was about 200 or 300 feet from the highest of these. So you can readily see that the so-called failure upon our part to top the highest of these little hills was certainly no failure."

"We reached the top on June 23. Meanwhile, from the time we passed the 15,000-foot point we had discovered that our perimian was bad. This popular North Pole food doesn't go for those high altitudes, and for two weeks, ascending and making the still more hazardous and trying descent, we were compelled to exist on crackers and tea. Living practically upon our own tissue, it was a terrible ordeal."

"Then we reached a height of 19,200 feet the weather became very bad again, and we were almost exhausted. We struggled on, however, with but three days' supplies left. The most terrific blizzard occurred when we reached about 20,000 feet from the highest ice hill. Our progress up the mountain had been dangerous and slow, and there was every reason to believe that we would have a much more difficult time descending. Brown and I came to the conclusion that there was absolutely nothing to be gained by trying to make the last 300 feet. Brown, who was ahead of me, was

ONLY TWO THINGS CAN DEFEAT WILSON

Death and Over-Confidence Might Keep Him From White House—Little Danger of Former.

[Special to The Times-Dispatch.]

Washington, September 29.—Two things, and two only, according to those who know what is what, can keep Woodrow Wilson from going into the White House as the successor to William Howard Taft on March 4 next: death and over-confidence on the part of the Democratic voters. Thanks to a good constitution, there is no immediate prospect of the Democratic nominee shuffling off any time in the near future, and as to the last proposition, that of over-confidence, the entry of the Bull Moose man into the arena has doubtless put the Democrats on extra guard, lest they count too strongly on success and lose all in the end.

News from the West from those who have been following the Bull Moose trail over the prairies here, there and everywhere where an audience could be found, shows a few things worth considering and remembering. It seems impossible for Wilson to lose the right, provided Democrats do their duty, for the simple reason, if nothing else were considered, that when he goes into the electoral college he will have the solid Democratic vote on his side, while Roosevelt and Taft must split the Republican strength. This seems so simple that a child can understand it, and figure it out to a satisfactory result, if, indeed, any figuring at all is needed to get results. It will not be necessary for Wilson to secure as many electoral votes in the college as Bryan received, also for the simple reason that there are two candidates to divide the Republican strength, while the united Democratic vote will, of course, carry Wilson. That should, and doubtless will, make Wilson's victory certain, except for one thing. No one has ever yet found out where the Republican party gets its funds for its campaigns, the steel trust, Standard Oil, etc., to the contrary notwithstanding, and it takes a whirl of money to run a campaign. The Republican party does not care a whit how or where it gets its money, or what trust or monopoly receives immunity thereby, so long as the coin is forthcoming, while the Democrats, more circumspect in their dealings with the big corporations, are thus handicapped.

In a nutshell, here is the situation at this time: It looks like Roosevelt will get at least 60 per cent of the normal Republican vote this year, leaving Taft the other 40 per cent, or possibly less. Suppose, this being the case, that the Republicans of the country, seeing that the victory is going to Wilson, should further eliminate Taft and center their strength on Roosevelt, contributing large sums of money, but him across in the effort to defeat Wilson, the result might be inevitable, and what now looks like a certain Wilson victory turned into bitter defeat. There is only one thing for the Democrats to do now: contribute liberally to offset the offerings of the Republicans, work for Wilson, talk Wilson and never despair. The victory is nearly won; in fact, it is within reaching distance, but money and plenty of it must be had to finance the campaign. This done, Wilson will go into the White House in March as the first Democrat who has had that privilege since Grover Cleveland.

It is a fair estimate at this time to give Roosevelt 60 per cent of the Republican vote and Taft 40 per cent. The White House has so small a following, perhaps, as Mr. Taft. A good man himself and honest as the day is long, it has never seemed to appear to the President that he is surrounded with official friends who are in some respects smarter than he and in many ways better politicians, and that ever since he became President he has been knowingly allowed them to pull him here and there, until at last he finds himself floundering helplessly and depending upon his patronage and the men he has appointed to office for whatever support he may have in the fight. And at this, not all his appointees are supporting him. A few will do so because of fear, some because of loyalty, and a great many not at all. In just about the same proportion that Wilson has Roosevelt beaten has the latter triumphed over President Taft. Poor old Taft. Funeral dirges are sounding for the G. O. P.

P. H. MCG.

To force our way forward meant that we were endangering our lives, and in our exhausted condition, with no substantial food to sustain us, it wouldn't take much to force us to death. We had made our goal; there was no scientific reason to stay there in the hope of getting better weather, so we started back after taking a remarkable series of photographs."

Professor Parker described an earthquake that occurred on the night of July 6, and he said it was the most terrific earthquake he had ever heard of. He said that the shock was so violent that it was like a great weight of tons of ice and snow were hurled from the mountain in a succession of mighty avalanches, and great chunks of the mountain itself were broken off and sent thundering down the mountain side. The roar and crash he described as something terrific. For ten days, he said, the shocks continued, and on several occasions the members of the expedition were thrown violently to the ground.

"I believe," said Professor Parker, "that the quake caused the mountain to settle perhaps scores of feet. Only accurate surveys can determine whether or not this is true. The disturbance probably had made the ascent easier for those who may attempt the feat in the future."

Professor Parker is now at his home, 21 Fort Greene Place, Brooklyn, where a baby daughter, Evelyn, was born while he was in Alaska.

Philadelphia, Pa., September 29.—A remarkable series of experiments, first conducted on his old mother, then on himself, and later on fifty of his intimate friends, has enabled Dr. Frank R. Starkey
